... tariff debate was opened by Reed ... who was listened to with close ... on. Reed began with a general ... ion of the principles of free trade ... Affection, and said referring to the ... nt's tariff message that protection ... dam, that tariff for revenue only ... own. Before the same arguments ...

... Democratic ... days of that admin... ... of a great civil ... ... the ... and ... member ... sold at ... discount of 10 per cent, as stated by the gentleman from Michigan. After the democratic party had gone out and the republican administration had come in, after the low tariff of 46 and 56 had been repealed and the Morrill tariff bill of 61 had been passed, the republican administration sold bonds at 15 per cent discount. Would it be fair ...

... Reed, in the course of his speech was frequently interrupted with laughter and applause. When he resumed his seat he was greeted with a round of applause, and was the recipient of many hearty congratulations from his party colleagues, who clustered around him and warmly pressed his hand. As ... sense of order, but when he had finally succeeded in doing so Carlisle proceeded.

Carlisle began by replying to Reed's charge of insincerity. He said that he might retort that if protection was a sound doctrine it should be carried to its logical conclusion—totally prohibitive duties. In China the doctrine carried out produced its logical effects. With every resource of natural wealth and a frugal, industrious people arts and manufacture were in their infancy. We wanted no China here. All taxation is an evil, and we should endeavor to make trade as free as possible with the lowest that would afford the necessary revenues. Reed had made no reference to the actual situation which made it imperatively necessary to reduce the revenue. On the first of this month there was $126,000,000 in the treasury more than was required to meet all the government liabilities. No monarchial government would dare extort such money in excess of its needs. The effect of this accumulation was to encourage useless and extravagant expenditures without constitutional warrant. The people almost to a man were demanding its return to them. We still have a large public debt outstanding, but it is not sound policy to continue to raise revenue to buy bonds at a premium. In one month the secretary had purchased $18,000,000 bonds, for which he had paid $3,536,000 above the principal and accrued interest. This unjust process must go on indefinitely unless congress comes to the relief and reduces taxation. He did not mean that every interest should not be considered in a friendly spirit, but he insisted that the interests of the many should not be subordinated to the interests of the few. (Applause.) The surplus should be distributed among all the people according to their ability to pay. Until that was done we should always be embarassed in the effort to increase or reduce taxes. If the present measure should fail and disaster come upon our industries by reason of over-taxation the present vicious system would be responsible for it.

He quoted Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, as favoring free raw material, which, he said, sounded like good old-fashioned democratic doctrine. (Applause.) The gentleman from Michigan (Burrows) has stated that the result of the passage of the tariff acts of '46 and '57 was to reduce the country to absolute bankruptcy, and so affect the credit of the government that it was compelled to borrow money in times of peace at a discount of from 12 to 20 per cent. The financial depression that occurred in '57 was an insignificant incident in history compared with the great commercial and industrial disaster that occurred in '73 and which devastated the country for five long years, ruining banking and insurance houses, extinguishing fires in furnaces, paralyzing the industries of the people and bringing down the prices of all our products of every kind. The country recovered from the depression of '57 in a comparatively few months, and like an awakened giant marched on its path of greatness and power. After the panic of '73 it struggled on for five long weary years. From the passage of the tariff act of '46 down to the last ten days of Buchanan's administration, when civil war was ... in this country, not a loaf of ... not a government ... in any form sold for less than par in gold, while many of them sold at ...

... discount of 10 per cent, as stated by the gentleman from Michigan. After the democratic party had gone out and the republican administration had come in, after the low tariff of 46 and '56 had been repealed and the Morrill tariff bill of 61 had been passed, the republican administration sold bonds at 15 per cent discount. Would it be fair ...

... which in fact had been pleantifully scattered over its prospects.

BLAINE HEARD FROM.

The New York World Sends an Interview to Blaine.

To Have the World Accept a Conditional Nomination.

He Says he has Nothing to Add to his Florence Letter.

His Health Strongest—Plans of the Coaching Trip.

... May 19.—In view of the ... Florence ... to the Chicago ... instructed to vote ... World on ... E. Crawford, as ... phone to visit Blaine ... to the question ... would accept ... in former years an ... Blaine and was ... received him with much cordiality. He ... several interviews by Mr. Blaine, and cables to the World tonight ... authorized statement. He says:

I have seen Blaine several times within the last three days, generally surrounded by his family. As regards the first question, whether he would accept it ... Mr. Blaine adheres to his Florence letter and does not withdraw ... word of his interview last February in Florence. I have no authority to say more than that, as Mr. Blaine ... again on this subject. His Florence interview was so explicit that the fact that he has now nothing to add to it by way of qualification should be enough to satisfy the most doubtful of Mr. Blaine's enemies of his future intentions. His declarations at Florence ... present state of mind. Those who associate with Blaine have no doubt of his entire good faith in withdrawing.

Crawford adds: Mr. Blaine will leave for England in a few days, and expects to reach London in the neighborhood of the first of June to join Andrew Carnegie's coaching trip into Scotland. He ... the campaign begins, ready to take hold and assist the nominee of the Chicago convention. At the time of the Chicago convention however, he will be on Carnegie's coach approaching the extreme north of Scotland, beyond the range of ordinary telegraphic communication.

Of his health Mr. Crawford says: It needs no medical expert to pass upon the bright clear look of his eyes, his good color and vigor shown in every one of his movements. He has to day the health that comes to a man as a reward for a life of simple habits and ...

The World in an editorial on the subject calls attention to the fact that the statement as rent is authorized by Mr. Blaine, that he might have dissipated the doubts about his candidacy with a few words, but that he "carefully and studiously refuses to refuse the nomination or say that a movement in that direction is without his approval."

Messrs. Ericson & Tonjir, proprietors of the Chicago bakery, have recently made several improvements in their establishment which will not only add to the convenience of their patrons but give them greater facilities for conducting their business. The partition in the rear of their ice cream parlor has been removed further back, thus greatly increasing the size of the room, which will now furnish seating capacity for over fifty people. A room 12x20 has been built on the rear of the building which will be used for freezing ice cream. A four horse power engine and a double action patent Mills machine will be kept in constant use, manufacturing ice cream. A large cellar has been made under the building in which candy will be made and kept and supplies stored. The proprietors of the establishment propose to make it one of the most popular resorts in the city. Their ice cream is unsurpassed in quality. They have contracted to supply a number of the Manitou hotels with this article during the summer.

Quite a novel and interesting affair will take place on the Athletic grounds next Saturday afternoon. A mounted sword fight between Captain Gaston, a noted swordsman, and the Countess Dorlinsky, who is without doubt the finest lady fencer living. The contestants as well as the horses will be covered completely with steel armor and mounted on fine ponies. The ... will be for a purse of $50 and will be a very attractive ... entertainment.

The Gresham movement is growing apace. At the present time it seems to judge by the newspaper reports he is the second choice of the majority of the delegates to the Chicago convention.

It is a strong point in Judge Gresham's favor that the national convention will be held in Chicago. This is the strongest Gresham district in the country. The Gresham boom really started here and the effect of it will be felt by every delegate. This was in 1880, the Blaine strong point. Before the Florence letter was published, Illinois republicans thought of no one but Blaine, but since that letter was published Blaine has been considered out of the field and republican sentiment has gradually settled upon Gresham. One delegate at large, who has been a Blaine man, said, "If Mr. Blaine should visit Chicago to-day we would give him a reception that a king might envy, but every delegate would, nevertheless, go into the convention and vote for Gresham. I believe if an individual poll could be made through this state and the question asked which man in the party would be preferred in the white house, the answer would be almost unanimous for Blaine. If they were asked who should be second, I think the response would be Gresham." This may seem anomalous, but it illustrates the distinction in the popular mind between the man who ought to get there and the man whom they think can.

The Hon. John D. Long, now serving a third term in congress, has announced to his constituents that he will not be a candidate for re-election, because he is unable to support his family on the salary that he receives. Governor Long was, perhaps, the most promising of the younger men in public life in New England. He had served three years as governor of Massachusetts and five years in congress. He unfortunately entered public life too early to have secured a competence from his profession, and now when he has made his position and is assured of retaining it, he is obliged to go back to the drudgery of professional life. If Mr. Long had not been what would be called in Washington an excessively honest man, it would have been entirely unnecessary for him to withdraw from public life in order to support his family. A good lawyer, who has the prominence Mr. Long has in either house of congress, finds a seat in congress is a help to his profession rather than a detriment. Jay Gould and others of his class who are interested in large corporations and also interested in legislation affecting those corporations in congress have a very delicate way of bribing congressmen. It is now the custom to retain as counsel prominent members in each house. A good corporation lawyer can readily earn more in congress than out. When Senator Edmunds, for instance, depended upon his profession before he entered public life, he was a very poor man, but during the last ten years he has become a very rich man. His retainers are probably not less than fifty thousand dollars a year. Some other senators might be mentioned. But Mr. Long seems to have been too pure a man to receive these delicate attentions from corporations. We arrange the salaries of our public servants in a way that such a man finds it necessary to retire from public life, while the same system makes it necessary that other public men, who are willing to receive these delicate attentions, remain in public life in order to receive a generous income. It makes one tired to hear so much talk about republican simplicity. Low salaries in high positions mean one of two things: either that only the rich can occupy the high official positions, or else that those who are poor must use their positions in an improper way. In England, the pay for members of parliament is nominal, but there is a large leisure class there which it is intended should make politics a profession. It assists in keeping this class in power to keep down the salaries of those in parliament. In our salaries for congressmen we are only following the rule of aristocratic England. This is in the interest of keeping the aristocratic party in power, or of corrupting the poor man who seeks the honor of this position. The salary of the congressman ought to be so high that a poor man can seek the office and yet maintain his personal honor. At present, the poor man who [illegible] for [illegible] cannot live in Washington on his salary. This is a republican government where every man is supposed to have the same show and the salaries ought not to be regulated so that the rich can hold the high offices.

But there is one respect in which this country might follow aristocratic England very properly. In those offices where the brightest minds are required very large salaries [illegible] people [illegible] compared to the judges of [illegible] receive from three to eight times the salary which our judges receive. We do not usually appoint judges to the supreme court until they have practiced sufficiently long to have obtained a competency. A good lawyer who has not a competency could not afford to go on the supreme bench. As a result, most of the appointments are of men whose age is from sixty to sixty-five. Few men are appointed in the prime of their powers. We could well afford to copy England in the salaries which it pays its judges, which is a good precedent, rather than follow the bad precedent of paying our legislative officers poorly, so that only the rich can afford to accept honors.

Republican Conference.

WASHINGTON, May 19.—A conference of republican representatives was held to-night. The subject of discussion was Mills' proposition to vote directly upon his tariff bill or the substitute to be offered by the republicans. It appears the majority of republicans are in favor of joining issues in this way, without passing through the tedious and protracted consideration of the bill in committee of the whole, for amendment. Some of the members who make up this majority are influenced in the matter by a desire to shorten the session and get home to their constituents before the dog days, while others believe the Mills bill [illegible] a direct vote. From present indications however, some forty republican members favor consideration of the bill under the five minute rule. Their motive is to divide the democracy by offering tempting amendments, or defeat the bill by delay. There was much talk but no action. Western members who participated strenuously persisted in their opposition to the Mills proposition despite all of the arguments of leading republicans. The conference lasted until nearly midnight and adjourned to meet again next Tuesday, when an effort to bring recalcitrants into line will be renewed.

Meanwhile it is said Mills has taken [illegible] and it is hardly to be regarded as a final proposition until the party has been united, but some of the leaders express the opinion that this will be effected. It is reported to contain the wool schedules of the 1867 tariff and a free sugar provision, besides the administrative features of the Mills bill.

Worst of the Flood Over.

QUINCY, Ill., May 19.—The river has fallen three and a half inches since last night, and it is now believed the worst of the flood is over. Depots of supplies have been established for relief committees at various points throughout the flooded districts, from which provisions and clothing are being distributed. Investigations made to-day show that previous reports of want and destitution have not been exaggerated. Hundreds of families require immediate assistance.

Suicide of Fred Marsden.

NEW YORK, May 19. Fred Marsden, the well known playwright, was found dead in his room this morning, having committed suicide by closing the windows and turning on the gas. Marsden was one of the most successful playwrights in America, and had an income of about $10,000 a year. He had been despondent for some time.

A SPANISH EXECUTION.

Administration of [illegible]

Extreme Punishment [illegible] a Guilty Jury.

The Murder--The Trial--[illegible] peas to the Queen.

Brotherhood of Peace and Charity--The Expiatory Chapel.

Madrid Apr. [illegible]

The crime was [illegible] Francisca Pozuelo, the lover Cantalejo, his friend Camarasa, [illegible] committed two [illegible] suburb of Madrid called La [illegible] inhabited by workmen, [illegible] prisoners and vagabonds generally.

Francisca Pozuelo had her husband [illegible] had often quarrelled [illegible] temper and was known to be anything but a faithful wife. She openly flirted and was frequently [illegible] company of Cantalejo, himself a married man who had been a soldier, had served his three years [illegible] companion who had also been a soldier [illegible] and who was [illegible] educated, stubborn, passionate, dangerous Castilian of the lowest class. He gave a good description of his feelings and standard of morality when he confessed during the trial that he had taken part in this crime in consideration of four pesetas, [illegible] dollar which his friend Cantalejo had given him. And he added: "But even if he had not offered me anything, that is the sort of job one would always go to help a friend."

So it came to pass that one morning the gendarmes found near the [illegible] dalera the dead and mutilated body of a man who turned out to be the husband of Francisca Pozuelo. He was last seen in her company and that of Cantalejo and Camarasa, upon whom suspicion was at once fixed. The trio were arrested, and after much time and trouble the following narration was drawn from the lips of the murderers.

The husband of Francisca Pozuelo had been led by her to a lonely spot where the two men and the woman set upon him, knocked him down, and killed him, whilst Camarasa killed him and afterwards mutilated his body. The woman and her accomplices then returned quietly to their homes and usual occupations. The wife even pretended to be terribly grieved when told that her husband had been found murdered.

The murderers of the Guindalera were brought to trial in Madrid [illegible] the criminal court, composed of a presiding judge and two associate justices. Trial by jury will only come into force next autumn, when the law recently passed by the cortes is promulgated. The reform, by the way, has met with much criticism and opposition from politicians and lawyers, who believe that the institution of the jury system will offer lead to the miscarriage of justice, as the jurors will be in dread of knife reprisals, especially in Andalusia.

Francisca Pozuelo, Cantalejo and Camarasa were finally sentenced to the "garrote vile" and to pay a fine and costs of the trial. Months passed [illegible] in appeals to the supreme court, [illegible] other formalities that the counsel for the defense used in order to gain time so as to reach holy week, when it is customary for the sovereign to grant Good Friday a few commutations of death sentences. This year Good Friday came and went, and the three [illegible] did not appear among the list of the pardoned. Matters began to look serious. The counsel and friends of the murderers looked to the regent, as it is well known how little she likes capital punishment, especially in the case of women. Dona Christina begged hard and on several different occasions the Prime Minister Sagasta and his colleagues to find some ground on which she could base a commutation. What moved her majesty most was that both the men had children, and Francisca Pozuelo not only had a child of ten years old, but she had been confined of another child in prison, a few months after her crime.

On the day before the execution the regent sent four times for Sagasta and at eleven that night she again called him and the ministers to make one last effort. But [illegible] and his colleagues answered that unless the death penalties were abolished altogether the law must take its course in this case. The queen then burst into tears and said that at any rate she would undertake to provide for the education and maintenance of the children of Pozuelo and Camarasa, who would be orphans and destitute. All this had such an effect on the queen that she was very ill all night and the day after the execution she [illegible] receive any visitors for [illegible]

Early on the morning [illegible] vious to the execution there was [illegible] than usual animation in the neighborhood [illegible] Francisca was confined in a small square room containing a bed, chairs, a table on which candles were burning, and a crucifix. Restoratives were on hand. There were constantly in attendance the female warders, one or two [illegible] of Peace and Charity. Francisca was able to hear the cries and oaths of her accomplices, who were in another part of the capilla. The unfortunate woman was in such a state that it was with difficulty that he was induced to take any food. She obediently prayed, confessed, made her will and took communion at the feet of the priests. She often spoke of her last child, and was much pleased when told that the queen would have it taken care of.

When the judge and officials went to the cells of the male prisoners to tell them that no hope remained, and that they must go to the fatal capilla they found Camarasa cool and steady. He heard his sentence and without uttering a word or a groan allowed the irons to be fastened on his ankles and the handcuffs on his wrists. He then walked without assistance to the chapel, heard mass, received the sacraments, and conversed with the officials. It was only towards evening that he began to show signs of despair.

But when Cantalejo's cell door was opened, he was found to be still in bed. On his head he cried out hoarsely: "This is the way you have deceived me! [illegible] hopes of pardon! Is this your [illegible] He refused to get up and [illegible] like a tiger with five strong [illegible] he could be overpowered [illegible] accompanied with [illegible] before he was handcuffed. Next he refused to [illegible] The woman [illegible] left her cell in a state of [illegible] and prostration, [illegible] the object of her passion. Cantalejo, the lover of Francisca, retained all his arrogance to the end. He even slept a few hours until, at half past two in the morning, the chaplains awoke the three condemned to hear their last confessions. It was a solemn sight in the lofty nave of the prison when the priests began to say the first mass. The tall tapers on the altar, the dim lights of the three excommunicated capillas, the side lights from the galleries, cast their pale, lurid glare over the great bare walls and windows, and over the doors behind which 1400 prisoners were sleeping or perhaps listening, as all knew of the last approaching execution. The officials, the priests, the devoted Brothers of Peace and Charity, the governor of the prison, the doctors and warders, all uncovered, some kneeling, some standing, were the only persons save a privileged few, myself, being of the number, who witnessed this strange, weird, solemn ceremony of the last rites of the church of Rome consoling three criminals about to appear before their maker.

Francisca Pozuelo confessed and took the sacrament and Camarasa did the same. At last a venerable old prison chaplain made a decisive appeal to the hardened heart of Cantalejo, and after some hesitation he consented to confess his sins, was shriven, and reconciled to the church some time before sunrise.

The fatal morning dawned brightly, and the sun rose upon a cloudless sky, a fresh breeze blowing straight from the Guadarrama mountains, as the people of Madrid and country folk began to assemble around the great prison. They came pouring in unceasingly in long files from the avenues of the suburb and directed their steps to the side of the walls where the scaffold could be seen with its three grim black posts and a bench in front of each one.

The gendarmes and squadrons of cavalry and much trouble in keeping the crowd at proper distance; and the dull roar of the multitude of voices without could be heard everywhere inside the prison. At about seven o'clock a regiment of chasseurs came up at a brisk step, its band playing a lively march to the very doors of the prison much to the surprise of the spectators and authorities, who requested the commanding officer to stop his musicians. But the order was given too late for the strains of the merry, singing notes had been heard by the three convicts in their capilla, and naturally reawakened hope.

At six a. m. the executioner came to superintend the last toilet of the prisoners. The Castilian Jack Ketch and his assistant are in the habit of asking those condemned to death to forgive them before being robed for the scaffold. So the executioner knees before the convict and says: "Ave Maria Purissima, my brother in Christ, thou knowest the [illegible] that brings me here? I am the hangman. Dost thou forgive me?" Then with the assistance of the Brothers of Peace and Charity he places on each man or woman a sort of robe in black or rime with broad sleeves, which is very much like a judge's gown. On the head of the men is put a cap on which has a yellow cross in front and on the head of the woman a woman's handkerchief, also adorned with a yellow cross. Then the prisoner's arms are tightly pinioned to the body at the elbows and irons fastened around the ankles so as to permit the taking of only short steps. And now the poor souls are forced to remain a whole hour in the capilla while the priests recite aloud the rosary and the prayers for the dying. Before the end of this terrible delay Cantalejo became unnerved and fainted as Camarasa and stupefied as Camarasa. The woman [illegible]

Directly he announced that all was ready, the doors of the prison yard were opened. The fatal procession of the condemned, the handsome, impassive, bearing and a crucifix. A couple of priests followed. They came to Cantalejo who had to be almost carried to the fatal post. Most pitiable bellowed praying aloud the poor young woman passed on to her little bench in front of one of the posts, the cap was fixed round her bare throat, a rag drawn over her face, and the executioner and his aid quickly stepped behind, ready to give the iron bar the twist that instantly crushes the prisoner's neck between the ring and post. The signal for the executioner to go his duty is when the officer said the convicts after him repeat in the creed the words, "I believe in God, in Jesus Christ, His only Son our Lord." Camarasa alone consented to repeat the words after the priest.

In less than four minutes after he appeared on the scaffold the first victim was dispatched and a second group of priests and brothers brought Cantalejo to the next bench, close to the now lifeless body of his accomplice. Cantalejo refused to listen to the priest and said to the executioner, whom he had met before: "Ah, Pepe, I never thought you would have to do this for me. Pray be quick about it."

The woman who had asked to be executed last was literally carried up the steps of the scaffold and seated almost senseless. When she was deserted by the crowd, a low murmur was heard from below.

The whole tragic affair had lasted about 13 minutes; and the executioner, who was the last person to leave the scaffold, now uncovered the faces of the three bodies in order to let the crowd gaze at their disfigured features until one hour before sunset. Thousands of people went during the day to get a glimpse of this awful sight, and at about half past five the Brothers of Peace and Charity, in stately procession, with a priest and acolytes bearing a cross, reappeared on the scaffold, unfastened the bodies and laid them in three coffins, which they carried on to the last resting place in the corner of the large new cemetery reserved for dead criminals, or, as they say in Castilian, Los ajusticiados. The first mass said for the repose of the souls was paid for by the judges and public prosecutor, who participated in their trial, and all of whom were present at the final ceremony.

Brazilian Emancipation.

NEW YORK, May 19. The following particulars of the new law abolishing slavery in Brazil have been received. All emancipated negroes now on coffee plantations are required to remain there until the next coffee crop is gathered, but in the meantime they are to receive a small rate of wages from their former owners and shall not be locked up in their quarters as formerly. The former owners receive no compensation for the liberated slaves. Nearly a million and a half of slaves are liberated by the new law. In recognition of this enlightened measure, removing the last stain of slavery from the new world, the pope has sent a golden rose to the princess regent of Brazil.

Slashing the Judge.

CLARKSVILLE, Ark., May 19.—The sittings of Judge Cunningham in the Johnson county circuit court yesterday were unsatisfactory to Attorney A. P. McKinnon who took exception to them. He [illegible] and when the judge fined him $50 a dispute followed, during which McKinnon cut the judge about the face and neck several times with a knife, inflicting dangerous wounds. McKinnon was arrested. The town is greatly excited over the affair.

A Fenian Plot.

LONDON, May 19.—The Central News announces that it is officially informed that the police have received news of a Clan Na Gael plotting, which contemplates the commission of a crime similar to the tragedy of Phœnix park. The police for some time have watched the movements of Thomas Brennan and found him conferring with a man named Walsh, who afterwards made a pretence of going to America to see Brennan and really did sail for Havre, ostensibly to take a steamer for New York. But after reaching Havre he went to Paris where he has been living under an assumed name. The police are closely watching men suspected [illegible] Further details of the plot are promised [illegible]

THE PARISIAN PRESS.

[illegible] Monarchy—The Political Parties.

Sketches of Some of the Most Noted Parisian Journalists.

PARIS, May [illegible]

[illegible] Republic [illegible] the public printer. Nowhere else are authors and academicians [illegible] with the daily newspaper. In other countries journalism is a [illegible] which leads to masters and brothers [illegible]

The great Catholic organ of France is the Univers. The late M. Louis Veuillot [illegible] Univers is devoted to the pope, whether the Vatican be occupied by a Pius IX. or a Leo XIII.

One of the best organs of the Count of Paris is the ancient Gazette de France, whose editor is M. Gustave Janicot. He has always been connected with this journal and has filled almost every position on its staff, until to-day he is its editor-in-chief, its owner and its soul. M. Janicot makes no pretension to literary tastes or polished style; but he has a wonderfully clear head for politics, and therein lies his strength and excellence as an editor.

But the real organ of Orleanism is the Soleil, with M. Edouard Hervé at its head. M. Hervé was a brilliant student at the Lycée Henri IV., where he graduated with honors, and at the famous Superior Normal school he also took a high stand. But his polished education was obtained in the best of all schools, in the public life of the period in which were moulded the political ideas of Prevost-Paradol, Thiers and Guizot. At the early age M. Hervé was hailed upon as a master of style. He took as model the most refined of Attics; those who consider as superfluous ornaments all rhetorical figures and comparisons. He is clear, precise and courteous in his editorials. His pen has never been guilty of gross personalities. In fact, M. Hervé is a born diplomat, and has honored the French press by his diplomatic qualities. I am convinced, however, that this [illegible] always regretted his being only a journalist. Even his recent admission to the society of the choice spirits of the French academy has not entirely comforted this man, who has always longed to be an actor on the public stage and not simply a chronicler of the doings and sayings of other actors.

The fashionable organ of Orleanism is the Gaulois, edited by M. Arthur Meyer, who has been justly dubbed a "society man." The height of his ambition is to be impeccably dressed, to go to parties and to see his name printed in the [illegible] grand [illegible] of other social gatherings. An Israelite M. Meyer might have succeeded in the special fields so often monopolized by his race. He might have been a banker, or actor, or musician, where Jews excel. But his aim was quite different, and not less difficult. When a youth he exclaimed one day: "I shall be a gentleman of society. I shall force my way into the most carefully guarded drawing rooms. I shall be the equal of princes. I shall kiss the hand of duchesses. I shall be on intimate terms with the greatest names of the Faubourg Saint Germain. In a word, I shall be the Beau Brummel [illegible]

And he has succeeded in this youthful ambition. He has even done more than he ever dreamed of doing. Arthur Meyer has not only made himself a perfect gentleman, he not only speaks and writes the French of the middlemen of the regime and of the aristocracy of today, but he has built up a newspaper which may be considered the organ of this elegant world in which he loves to move.

The famous Figaro has found the Gaulois a formidable rival in the drawing rooms and chateaux of France. But nothing can check the prosperity of the creation of the late M. de Villemessant, whose two lieutenants, MM. Francis Magnard, Prévost and de Rodays, carry on the [illegible]

M. Magnard [illegible] the Figaro and almost every day publishes in its columns [illegible] at his fingers' ends, so that his newspaper articles are perfect marvels of political erudition. Although no longer a deputy he exercises through his newspaper writings a strong influence at the Palais Bourbon, where he is often seen in the lobbies, arguing with as much effect as if he were on the floor of the house.

M. Adrien Hebrard, editor of the famous Temps, resembles M. Rouché in many particulars. Judged by the dignified austere columns of his journal you might imagine M. Hebrard to be a tall gentleman, perhaps a blonde with chill manners, circumspect, dogmatic, with a pair of gold spectacles across his nose, a conservative in politics and a Methodist in religion. But he is nothing of the kind. The real editor of the Temps is a fat little man, good natured, bustling, gesticulating, enjoying society, sceptical, alert, witty. He has separated himself into two distinct parts. The amusing and piquant side of him appears in the senate, of which he is a member, and is seen by his friends, the other, austere and grave, he reserves for the readers of the Temps.

The Temps has the widest columns, the broadest pages and the largest number of subscribers of any other evening paper published in Paris. It offers its readers more variety, too. Its telegrams, correspondence, editorials and chroniques are of the highest order.

It is in the pages of the Temps that M. Francisque Sarcey, the "prince of dramatic critics," prints his remarkable series of weekly theatrical reviews. Sarcey is perhaps the most characteristic of Parisian journalists. He is a most prolific writer; his productions finding their way into a prodigious number of republican journals. Everybody knows him by sight, this rotund little man, with florid rubicund face, rosy cheeks and snow besprinkled hair. He is a charming conversationist, a clever author, an amusing, familiar, and learned chroniqueur. He never misses a Mardi night, lectures once a week on some literary topic, hates priests and pedants. In a word, Francisque Sarcey is one of the most Parisian of journalists and one of the most original of Parisians.

M. Sarcey also writes regularly in the Republique Française, the paper founded by Gambetta and edited to-day by one of his young and brilliant disciples, M. Joseph Reinach. The staff of writers of this organ of opportunism is composed in the main of ex-cabinet ministers or of future cabinet ministers. M. Reinach, who has wealth, is elegant in dress, manner and literary style. His newspaper is academic, scholastic even, and is read by politicians, but never opened by the people.

The Siecle, on the contrary, used to be found in all tap rooms. But to-day the tap rooms, which have been on the increase of late, are more numerous than the readers of the Siecle. The one sou papers, which have also grown in numbers, have dealt another hard blow to the better class of journals. The Siecle has suffered thereby. But M. Phillippe Jourde's daily is well edited and read by an influential class.

M. Maguier's Evenement is remarkable for two things: it has always been opposed to "[illegible] de liste" the whole department voting for a single list of deputies, and in favor of the distinct system; and it has been a sort of nursery of chroniqueurs, who have won laurels in French journalism and thus reflected honor on the newspaper in which their first effusions appeared.

The France owes its reputation and early success to Girardin, whom its present editor, M. Charles Lelou, cannot be said, of course, to equal. It is noted to-day for being General Boulanger's ablest supporter.

M. Charles Laurent and his Paris are best known at present for the fearless way in which they attacked M. Daniel Wilson, and brought to light the recent political scandals.

M. Charles Laurent found an able ally in Mr. Portales, editor of the Dix-neuvieme Siecle, who has the most American looking and American edited paper in Paris. As regards the reporting, the telegraphic matter, and the make-up of the page, M. Portales has taken the transatlantic journal as his model. Nor does M. Portales limit his American notions to innovations in journalism. He is also one of the most pronounced advocates of the introduction into France of the political institutions of the United States.

Among the best known contributors to M. Laurent's journal is M. Henry Fouquier, who writes at least fifteen hundred lines a day, who sends "copy" to seven or eight Parisian papers, and, in addition, is the active correspondent of several provincial and foreign sheets. Notwithstanding this vast amount of work, M. Fouquier's composition is elegant and interesting, and shows no trace of hasty preparation.

Victor Hugo's organ was the Rappel. It still exists under the direction of his faithful devotees, M. Auguste Vacquerie, the talented dramatist; M. Edouard Lockroy, the deputy, minister and stepfather of the poet's grandchildren; and M. Paul Meurice, who is also a playwrite of repute.

I have space only to mention the Petit Journal with its million readers; the Intransigeant, edited by the famous Henri Rochefort; the socialistic Cri du Peuple, with Mme. Severine at its head, and in whose columns Louise Michel publishes her wild lucubrations; and the Cocarde, the youngest member of the Parisian press, the student-organ of Boulanger and Boulangism, edited by Georges La Bruyere, until recently connected with the Cri du Peuple.

A WORK OF GREAT INTEREST

Did Shaxper or Francis Bacon Write Shakespeare?

Preliminary Sketches—The Wonderful Scholar Bacon—The Illiterate Stratford Family—How Did Shakspere Spell His Name?—His Daughters—Learning of the Plays—Law of the Play—Course of the Discussion—Mr. Ignatius Donnelly Expounds the Subject.

Mr. Ignatius Donnelly

In the latter part of the seventh century two great lights suddenly blazed out in the galaxy of British intellects. So far did they surpass all who went before, that each is taken as the founder of a new system, both as the beginners of a new era. So great have they seemed to all who have come after that comparison is considered high praise. So far did they outshine all contemporaries in their several lines, that those are for the most part only quoted as witnesses to these two; and while the time abounded in heroes, statesmen, scientists and explorers, these two gave to that distinctive glory which still attaches to the Elizabethan age. These men were a certain dramatist, whose name is in dispute, but usually printed "Shakespeare," and Francis Bacon, Baron Verulam and Viscount of St. Albans. Comes now the Hon. Ignatius Donnelly and offers to prove that these two were one; that "Shakespeare" is a nom de plume, adopted in mild burlesque of a certain witty actor and stage manager; that the authorship of the plays was concealed for political reasons, and thus the ignorant actor has been credited with the philosopher's work. It is as if we should place Pike's Peak on the Pyramids, or add the strength of Samson to the muscles and stature of Goliah. If we must add the greatest philosopher down to that time to the greatest dramatist of all time, the colossal intellect thus evoked overpowers the common mind; and we can only resolve the explanation to the philosophy of miracles.

Let us, therefore, examine Mr. Donnelly's argument carefully, and add to it what others have discovered, for the theory is no new thing. For nearly half a century it has been gaining adherents; at least 250 books and pamphlets thereon have been issued, and literary men are already ranged in two hostile camps—the Baconians and Shakespearians. This article is merely an attempt to present the evidence in compact form, and point out the strongest and weakest counts in Mr. Donnelly's plea, just issued.

THE CONTRASTED TWO.

No two men could differ more widely than the known philosopher and the supposed dramatist. Lord Bacon was nobly born, rich (except during one period of his life) and learned beyond all men of his time, a refined courtier, a profound lawyer and an able judge, an aristocrat in politics and a life long companion of noblemen and the adherents of royalty. Of the supposed dramatist the exact reverse was true in every respect until the middle or latter part of his life, when he had gained fame and fortune. The contrasted evidence is amazing and startlingly suggestive. Of Lord Bacon we know as much as of any man in English history. He was born at York house, in the Strand, London, Jan. 22, 1561, and died at Highgate, April 9, 1626. His father was a baronet, Sir Nicholas Bacon, his mother of noble blood and extraordinary talents. The few specimens extant of her letters are perfect models of graceful and classical English. The style is noticeably "Shakespearian." She adopted Puritan views, and her letter warning her sons, Francis and Anthony, against the theatre, bears a striking similarity to passages in the great dramas. Francis was precocious and his health was delicate. At 8 years of age he read the books usually perused by his parents; at 11 he produced an essay on the laws of the imagination; at 12 he entered Trinity college, Cambridge, whence he graduated with high honors, and at the age of 16 he lodged a protest against the philosophy of Aristotle, then preferred at the college, and against the general system of teaching. "They learn nothing," he said, "except to believe. They are like a becalmed ship; they move but by the wind of other men's breath and have no oars of their own to steer withal." From childhood he was polite and witty.

"How old are you, my pretty boy?" asked Queen Elizabeth when his mother brought him to court.

"Two years younger than your majesty's happy reign," replied the witty little courtier.

He read all the Greek and Latin authors critically, spoke French and Italian, and had some knowledge of Dutch and German. He traveled on the continent of Europe, resided in Paris, read law two years, and was admitted to the bar at the age of 21. At 23 he was made counsel extraordinary to the queen; at 32 he was chosen member of parliament for Middlesex, and devoted himself to a reform of the laws. Subsequently he was special counsel to King James I; then solicitor general, attorney general, and finally lord high chancellor. In 1618 he was created Baron Verulam, and in 1621 Viscount of St. Albans.

We turn now to the alleged dramatist, and are at once almost lost in obscurity. At first view he would seem no more a real historical person than Romulus or Agamemnon. We know that there is a name, "Shakespeare," attached to immortal works, from which we form exalted conceptions of the author, and a portrait accompanying the works, which is admitted to be an "improvement" or flattering imitation of a very different picture. We also know that there was an individual whose name bore a very slight similarity to the other in sound, and a queer resemblance in spelling; that he came at an early age from Stratford-on-Avon, lived thirty years in London, grew very rich as manager of a theatre, returned to his native place and spent his few remaining years in easy living, diversified by some rather disreputable actions. But that is all. Not a line in his handwriting, not a scrap of his writing, not a book, not a letter, not a note, not a line of literary matter, not a trace of his existence in London while he was there the greatest dramatist of the age, not a line from his contemporaries concerning him as a literary man, not a line from his family concerning his literary ability, not a line from the great literary men of the time concerning him, not a line from the great literary men of the next two generations concerning him, not a line from the great literary men of the next two centuries concerning him except a few lines in Milton, which are supposed to refer to him, but which do not even prove that Milton had ever heard of the man of Stratford-on-Avon.

Of his family we know that his father signed his name by a mark, his daughter Judith married a wine merchant and signed her name by a mark, and his daughter Susanna married Dr. Hall, a man of some education, who left a diary in which he never mentions his famous relative. We know that the Shakespeares were illiterate, that they had no connection with the literary men of their time, that they left no literary relics behind them, that they were illiterate to the last, that they left no books behind them, that they were illiterate in their wills, that they were illiterate in their graves. We know that the only Warwickshire contemporary who mentions the Stratford man never mentions his literary ability, but speaks of him as a money lender and grain dealer. We know that the only Stratfordian who ever claimed that his townsman was the author of the plays never made the claim until 107 years after the death of Shakspere, and then based it on the tradition of a gossiping old parson who was not born in Stratford until 31 years after the death of Shakspere, who was not in the town during the period when Shakspere is said to have been there, who wrote down the tradition on hearsay 60 years after he heard it, who confused the dates of the death of the father and the birth of the son, who jumbled together the events of two different reigns, who committed other blunders, and who, therefore, is a worthless witness. We know that the only Stratfordian who ever had any personal knowledge of the man never claimed that Shakspere was the author of the plays, and that the only one who ever came to Stratford to see the man who was the author of the plays never found any one who had ever heard that Shakspere was the author of the plays. We know that the only Stratfordian who ever had any personal knowledge of the man never claimed that Shakspere was the author of the plays, and that the only one who ever came to Stratford to see the man who was the author of the plays never found any one who had ever heard that Shakspere was the author of the plays. We know that Shakspere's own family [illegible] NEW YORK, May 12. [illegible] a product and [illegible] institution. It is the [illegible] that are [illegible] the prophecy of the future. [illegible] of the present and [illegible] of the future. [illegible] the condition of literary [illegible] simply a product of [illegible] are characteristic [illegible] of their growth [illegible] by the nutriment on which they [illegible] that the moral and intellectual life of to-morrow must of necessity be the impress of the literature of to-day.

[illegible] compliance of classic models—of the great masters of literature in all ages—will be felt in the future as in the past. [illegible] the student of the present may in [illegible] as much of the literature of the past as his father did before him, but he also has a hundred times as much of the literature of to-day. His mental aliment or mental [illegible] extend hitherto unheard by the intellectual producers of literary output of to-day. It will [illegible] the mind and intellectual life [illegible] upon it will be healthy; if it be its resultant effects will be evil. [illegible] there can be neither question nor [illegible] things are necessary to the proper development [illegible] of literature: [illegible] and inspiration. The [illegible] essential to the well-being of [illegible] strength, purity and [illegible] are valueless; with purity, strength and aspiration only vice and demoralization [illegible] spiration, purity and strength are [illegible] of good results. The true test of literary tendency of any age, there [illegible] the effect it is likely to produce [illegible] the intellectual strength, moral and individual aspiration of those [illegible] to its influences during the live period.

[illegible] "says the modern critic, [illegible] an art, not a purpose; and its excellence depends on method, not intent. It is the same whatever the subject, the skill equally great whatever the motive. The function of literature—[illegible] creative literature, I mean—is [illegible] to interest, amuse, entertain; [illegible] attempt to confine art to moral [illegible] sure merit by skill rather than [illegible] to divorce genius from motive, is [illegible] new idea. It only seems a little absurd today because it has gone [illegible] further in its unconscious [illegible] and asserts that he who [illegible] effect cannot be an artist—that the [illegible] man who seeks to produce good [illegible] by that very fact debases his art. [illegible] the curious philosophy [illegible] the standard of "realism" a philosophy at once absurd, illogical and [illegible]. Skill is not and cannot be the criterion of merit in literature [illegible]. The very distinction between the [illegible] and the artisan lies in the fact [illegible] the former has something which the [illegible] has not, something more than [illegible] the use of tools or the shaping of [illegible].

[illegible] too, in literature, there is an [illegible] something that marks the line [illegible] good and bad, which is not dependent upon the author's skill and [illegible] can be estimated only by the effect [illegible] upon the reader. A great subject [illegible] indeed may make a great artist, and [illegible] by purpose will not insure a good [illegible]; but it is only [illegible] to use his skill to inform a fit subject with that inter[illegible] which shall make [illegible] internal appeal to sentiment, emotion [illegible] exploration. All the skill of all the [illegible] cannot make a great picture of an [illegible] subject—a flea, a sore or a [illegible]. And that intention [illegible] worthy which joins to a noble [illegible] the skill which makes its grand [illegible] on elevating and [illegible]. Both in literature and in art, the absolute merit is the effect produced on those subjected to its influence. The use of means and instruments is only a measure of comparative [illegible]. The art which degrades is never [illegible] the literature which [illegible] degrades and depresses is never a literature, and no amount of skill [illegible] part of author or artist can save it from ultimate condemnation. [illegible] most dangerous tendency of our literature is this inclination to [illegible] rather than effect the [illegible]. In our desire to avoid [illegible] we have forgotten that [illegible] all there is of truth. We [illegible] the distinction between [illegible] moral and the moral effect [illegible] that is, no specific ethical [illegible] which it was intended to [illegible], the fact that it secures [illegible] fortitude and honor that [illegible] an undying impulse to [illegible] from Alexander's [illegible] Gladstone's heroic self-sacrifice [illegible] Shakespeare and Scott and [illegible] the greatest names [illegible] whose works have indeed [illegible] purpose but have [illegible] world [illegible] contrast [illegible] strength with [illegible] with cowardice, [illegible] with [illegible] virtue [illegible]

PALMER LAKE

The New and Popular Resort of Colorado and Sanitarium of the Rockies. The most attractive and Romantic Spot in the State. The Location of the Colorado Chautauqua.

Attention is invited to the unusual merits of this long celebrated point.

The location is unsurpassed for natural beauty. Delicately poised on the summit of the continental divide, 7,200 feet above the sea level, girt by towering mountains, is the little lake which is the nucleus of the brightest and most charming resort on the slope of the Rockies.

The hills and glens are dotted with cottages. A complete system of water works conveys from the mountains water pure and sparkling, to supply fountains and reservoirs, hotels and dwelling houses.

Streets, drives, walks, parks and look-out points have been laid out under the eye of a skillful landscape engineer.

The Colorado Chautauqua

Has a splendid auditorium with a seating capacity of 1,000 persons. The Lake is a gem in itself. A most beautiful lake and numerous skiffs are available at all hours for the pleasure seeker. Palmer Lake is the most accessible resort in Colorado, being only 52 miles from Denver, 22 from Colorado Springs, and 68 from Pueblo, with 20 passenger trains stopping daily at the Lake.

The present hotel accommodations will soon be largely increased. A NEW LARGE AND BEAUTIFUL HOTEL with about 70 rooms is to be commenced at once, and other extensive improvements inaugurated.

The Palmer Lake Town Co. will Offer For Sale

Mr. W. P. Meserve of the firm of Meserve & Estabrook left for Denver Friday evening.

In the county court the cases of the City vs. C. W. Church and the City vs. O. H. Barney were set for trial on May 31st.

Mr. Max Wenger, one of Manitou's oldest and most prominent citizens died after a protracted illness on Friday last.

Several sections of grading will be completed on the Denver extension of the Grange by the end of the present month.

It is hardly necessary to call attention to the advertisement on this page setting forth the latest and most improved invention in the bed spring line.

A pile driver belonging to the Santa Fe railroad was yesterday at work driving the piles for the new crossing of the cable road and the Santa Fe [illegible] service. [illegible] Cimarron [illegible] day as usual. [illegible] Sunday school at 9.45 a.m. [illegible] preaching at 11 a.m.

At the Episcopal church [illegible] Rev. Richard Montague will preach in the morning and Mr. A. M. Hart in the evening. Sunday school at 3 p.m.

Mr. W. H. [illegible] something to say in the business locals this morning. He is fully prepared to accommodate picnic parties and has a thorough knowledge of all points of interest in this vicinity.

Lizzie Evans and her comedian will introduce a spirited medley from the comic opera "Erminie" in "Our Angel" at the opera house tomorrow night. The music and dancing in this play are said to be a decided feature.

Mr. T. T. Palmer has just completed a number of improvements to the half way house on the Pike's Peak trail. He has made a large addition to the hotel and the accommodations for guests have been greatly improved.

Mr. David McShane has begun work on the Manitou road west of Colorado City with a large force of men. He has also received the contract for repairing the road within the corporate limits of Manitou and Colorado City.
